An eight-year-old girl, Daisy Edmonds, was not really happy when her mother took her to the supermarket. What made her feel so terrible? The answer is surprising----clothes! She noticed the boys' and girls' clothes were different, and she was not happy about it. Her mother found it interesting, so she recorded what she said and put it on the Net.

When Daisy was asked about her idea, she pointed out the words on the clothes were different. For example, the word on the girls' clothes was "beautiful." She questioned why being beautiful seemed to be the only thing that mattered for girls. Another girl's T-shirt had "Hey!" on it, which made her even angrier. She didn't understand why it was important for a girl to "wear" that word. Then she noticed the words on boys' clothes were "just be yourself" and "think outside the box." She thought "think outside the box" was wonderful because it meant one should be brave to try what he really wanted.

Why can't adults notice the differences? Is it really fair for everyone? Can't boys be pretty? Can't girls fight for their own dreams? Maybe we should start to find out what makes them different. Is that because they were born like this? Or we, the adults, make them become like this?
